Cicero's Life and Career

Cicero was born in Arpinum, a small town in central Italy, in 106 BC. He came from a wealthy and well-connected family, and he received a traditional Roman education in rhetoric and philosophy. Cicero began his political career in 80 BC, when he was elected to the quaestorship, one of the lowest offices in the Roman government. He quickly rose through the ranks, and he was elected to the consulship, the highest office in the Republic, in 63 BC.

Cicero's consulship was a time of great political turmoil. The Republic was on the verge of civil war, and Cicero played a key role in preventing the outbreak of violence. He also helped to pass a number of important laws, including the Lex Manilia, which gave Pompey the Great the command of the Roman army in the East.

After his consulship, Cicero continued to play an active role in Roman politics. He served as a governor of Cilicia, a province in Asia Minor, and he was a member of the Senate. Cicero was a staunch supporter of the Republic, and he opposed the rise of Julius Caesar. When Caesar crossed the Rubicon River in 49 BC, Cicero fled Rome and joined Pompey's forces.

After Pompey's defeat at the Battle of Pharsalus, Cicero surrendered to Caesar. Cicero was pardoned by Caesar, but he was not allowed to hold public office again.

Cicero spent the rest of his life writing and teaching. He wrote a number of philosophical works, including the De Officiis, the De Finibus, and the Tusculan Disputations. He also wrote a number of letters, which provide a unique glimpse into his life and thought.
