One of the most forgotten units that fought in the Battle of Brooklyn was the Maryland 400. This regiment of volunteer soldiers was raised in Maryland in 1775, and it was one of the first units to join the Continental Army.

The Maryland 400 was commanded by Colonel William Smallwood. Smallwood was a veteran of the French and Indian War, and he was one of the most experienced officers in the Continental Army.

The Maryland 400 was a well-trained and disciplined unit. They were equipped with muskets and bayonets, and they were known for their accuracy and their ability to fire quickly.

At the Battle of Brooklyn, the Maryland 400 was assigned to defend a section of the American line. The British attacked the American line in waves, and the Maryland 400 was forced to fight off several attacks.

The Maryland 400 fought bravely, but they were outnumbered and outgunned. The British eventually broke through the American line, and the Maryland 400 was forced to retreat.

The Maryland 400 suffered heavy losses at the Battle of Brooklyn. Over 200 men were killed or wounded. The regiment was never fully recovered from its losses, and it was disbanded in 1777.

The Maryland 400 is a forgotten unit of the American Revolutionary War. However, their bravery and determination should not be forgotten. They played a key role in the Battle of Brooklyn, and they helped to defend the American cause.

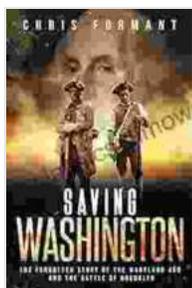

In 2020, a book was published about the Maryland 400. The book is titled "The Forgotten Story of the Maryland 400 and the Battle of Brooklyn." The book tells the story of the regiment from its formation to its disbandment.

The book is a valuable resource for anyone who is interested in the American Revolutionary War. It is a well-written and researched book, and it sheds light on a forgotten chapter of American history.

If you are interested in learning more about the Maryland 400, I encourage you to read the book "The Forgotten Story of the Maryland 400 and the Battle of Brooklyn." You will not be disappointed.
